PART I

OVERVIEW

Why this Analysis was Undertaken

In its report of May 14, 1976 on the Bill HR 13615, the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives included the following:

"When the CIA Retirement Act was originally considered by Congress in 1964 particular attention was focused on section 203 of the Act, which authorizes the Director to designate 'such Agency officers and employees whose duties are determined by the Director to be (i) in support of Agency activities abroad hazardous to life or health or (ii) so specialized because of security requirements as to be clearly distinguishable from normal government employment, hereafter referred to as participants, who shall be entitled to the benefits of the system'. Essentially, that provision was the basis for creating a separate retirement system and it was the intent of Congress that this system should apply to the relatively small percentage of Agency employees who were actually subjected to these very special hazards.

"During the course of consideration of this legislation there have been indications that in recent years there may have been deviations on the part of the Agency in administering this separate system from a strict application of the provisions of section 203 in designating officers and employees as participants in the CIA retirement system in line with the original intent of Congress when that system was created.

"Accordingly, in the exercise of its oversight function the Committee has directed that the CIA conduct a careful analysis of the application of the qualifying provisions of section 203 of the CIA Retirement Act in designating participants with reference to the special circumstances justifying their inclusion, and that the results of such analysis be reported to the Committee by the Director of Central Intelligence not later than October 1, 1976, and on an annual basis thereafter."
